WIPO Consumer Survey Toolkit on Respect for IP

INTRODUCTION

The WIPO Consumer Survey Toolkit on Respect for IP is intended for use by public- and private-sector bodies wanting to measure consumer attitudes towards pirate and counterfeit goods. It is designed in a modular format with the intention that, so long as the general guidelines specified within this document are followed, comparisons can be drawn between surveys which have been carried out independently of one another.

The creation of the Survey Toolkit was made possible by Funds-in-Trust provided by the Ministry of Culture, Sports and Tourism of the Republic of Korea, which support WIPO gratefully acknowledges.

Why use the Consumer Survey Toolkit?

- Benchmark attitudes to piracy and counterfeit goods – changing attitudes can be tracked over time
- Identify key trends in consumption of infringing goods and services to inform prioritisation of resources for preventive measures
- Evaluate strategies for Building Respect for IP
- Assess media campaign effectiveness
- Establish measures for inter-territorial comparison.

The key outputs envisaged from the survey templates are a measure of the percentage of the population within a territory who are exposed to and using counterfeit or pirate goods and services as well as their attitudes towards the use of such infringing goods.

The survey does not just measure the incidence of using infringing goods but can also be used to provide detail on the most prevalent types of infringement, routes to market and factors which may have the potential to reduce infringing behaviour.

Ideally the survey should be used as a tracking study with fieldwork repeated on a periodic basis, e.g. every 12 months, to monitor how the incidence of consumption of infringing goods and services and attitudes towards them change over time.

If the media campaign section is included, it is also possible to assess the effectiveness of any such recent campaigns within a territory.

The output from the survey can be used for outreach purposes by providing a comparable, quantitative data set. By monitoring attitudes to infringement and infringing activity over time, the effectiveness of strategies for building respect for IP can be assessed. Such data can be used as evidence to guide resource allocation.

OVERVIEW

The survey toolkit contains four structured survey questionnaire templates to cover four different types of goods that may be illegally copied or counterfeited.

- Digital Goods – music, movies, video games, TV series and books
- Consumer Goods – food products, drinks, cosmetics, medicines, household items
- Luxury Goods and Clothing – handbags, designer clothing labels
- Books and Articles – consumer books, audiobooks, academic articles and text books.

There are also four further questionnaire documents applicable to all four of the core questionnaire templates.

- Computer Software module
- Media Campaign Assessment Section
- Closing Demographics Section
- Questionnaire template accompanying notes.

The first of these is an additional module covering infringing behaviour with computer software, intended to be added to any of the four core questionnaires. The second allows the option to include questions on measuring the effectiveness of any media campaign recently deployed in market and the third contains additional demographic classification questions that may be added to the end of any of the survey questionnaire templates.

The questionnaire template accompanying notes cover the detail within the templates, providing both guidance on questionnaire customisation and an explanation on how the different sections of the questionnaire template work together to provide reliable survey results.

While the survey questionnaire templates are set up to work as a self-contained unit delivering a full set of results, a direct comparison of results between different surveys, either over time or between different countries or regions can provide further levels of context and insight.

This toolkit aims to provide all the necessary materials to set up a survey into the use of infringing goods and services. It is anticipated that users will employ the services of a fieldwork agency to administer and carry out the actual fieldwork and it is recommended that the same agency is also used to produce at least an initial analysis of the collected data.

In case of any query, WIPO may be contacted by email at enforcement@wipo.int.

SETTING UP THE SURVEY

In order to run an efficient and effective consumer survey there are several initial decisions that need to be made.

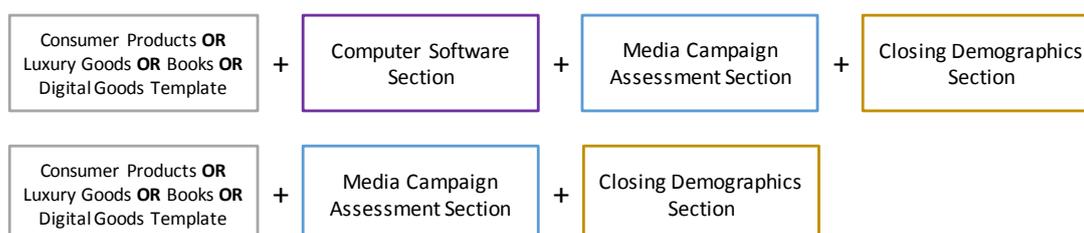

1. Survey Questionnaire Template Choice
2. Survey Methodology
3. Sample Design
4. Personal vs. Household Level Data
5. Media Campaign Test Methodology.

The survey toolkit has been set up in a modular format to cover many different configurations and survey methodologies. Once the decisions above have been made the survey templates can be customised to meet the specific needs of the particular organisation. Guidance on how best to do this is provided below and further detail in the questionnaire template accompanying notes.

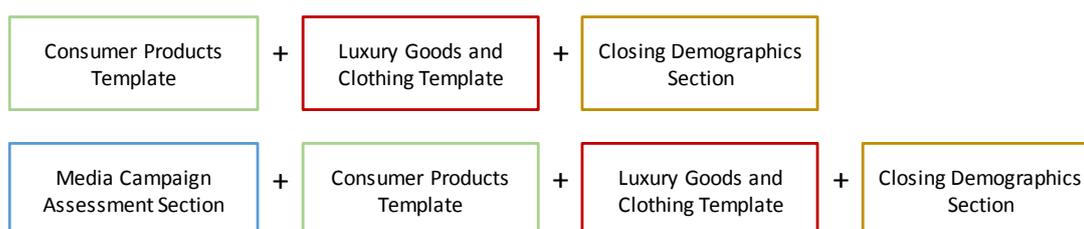

1. QUESTIONNAIRE TEMPLATE CHOICE

The survey toolkit includes four different core questionnaire templates to cover four different types of infringing goods and services. In some territories it may be appropriate to use just one or two of these templates, others may want to use all four. The computer software section, media campaign assessment section and closing demographic sections are intended to be added to any of the four core templates. It is not intended however that any one survey respondent is shown more than one core questionnaire template or that templates for different types of infringing goods are joined together to make one longer interview.

Recommended Configurations

Non-Recommended Configurations

If more than one template is to be used, it is intended that separate surveys should be run for each questionnaire template. Comparable samples should be used for each of the four surveys if it is desired to draw direct comparisons between the results.

It is recommended that question wordings are not changed significantly from those in the questionnaire template. Similarly, the order in which questions appear should be retained. This is to enable cross-territory comparison by retaining a standard core of questions. It is however entirely possible - and indeed recommended - that additional questions are added to the end of the questionnaire template to cover any additional respondent classification needs (see Section 7) and categories of goods or retailers are added or deleted as required by territory. Equally, additional attitudinal questions can be added although these should be inserted into the existing battery of attitude statements rather than added to the end of the questionnaire.

The key consideration when adding additional questions is to aim to keep the interview length manageable. If too many questions are added the risk of respondent fatigue increases significantly with interview length and this can result in poor quality data.

The list of categories included in each questionnaire should be tailored to each market. If there is a known problem of infringing goods within a category of goods not included in the questionnaire template, then this category can be added to all relevant questions as an additional option. Similarly, if there is a category that does not really exist within a particular territory then it can be removed from the questionnaire. The same principle applies to retail outlets. If kiosks are a significant retail outlet within a territory, then they can be added to all questions where respondents are asked about a range of different retail outlets.

The survey questionnaire templates have been structured in a way that allows respondents to answer questions on behaviour at the beginning of the interview before they have answered the attitudinal questions. Questions are asked this way round because otherwise, there is a risk that they might modify their responses to behavioural questions after considering attitudinal questions in depth. Thus if additional questions are to be added to a questionnaire, it is important to maintain the order specified in the template as closely as possible.

2. SURVEY METHODOLOGY

The questionnaire templates have been set up primarily with an online interview methodology in mind. However, there are many factors that are likely to influence the choice of methodology to be used.

In practice it is only appropriate to use an online methodology in territories with high Internet penetration levels. Even then, there is a risk of overstating online behaviours and it may be appropriate to use a hybrid methodology (see subsection ii below).

The most likely methodological choices are discussed below.

i. Online interviewing

An invitation to participate in the survey is sent out to a pre-recruited online panel of respondents, via a reputable panel provider. Panel providers maintain large databases of individuals who have volunteered to participate in consumer research studies. People who respond to the invitations are then screened through the initial screening questions and only those who meet the specified recruitment quotas go through to complete the survey.

This methodology is fast and tends to be very cost effective but only really works in countries with high levels of Internet penetration. Because respondents complete the survey themselves there is no possibility of interviewer bias and they may be more open in their responses. This is particularly relevant when discussing illegal activities. Recruitment is nationwide and thus, as long as relevant quota controls have been set, the sample should be widely geographically distributed.

The main potential downside of online methodologies is that online panel members tend to be heavier than average internet users and so online activities can be over-reported.

Note that it is entirely possible to run an online survey without using the services of a research agency. However, it would be necessary to code the questionnaire oneself and to obtain a large database containing email addresses of people representing a wide representation of the target sample.

ii. Online Hybrid Methodology

This approach is used when Internet penetration is at a reasonable level but not universal. A majority of the survey interviews are conducted using an online methodology as above but these interviews are 'topped-up' with an off-line sample. If for example, Internet penetration is at 80% then 80% of the sample interviews can be collected using an on-line methodology. However, a further 20% of interviews will be conducted amongst respondents who do not have access to the Internet using one of the off-line methodologies outlined below.

This hybrid approach allows a more representative sample than a pure online methodology. However it tends to be more expensive and fieldwork takes longer than pure online research. There are two key factors influencing this, the use of trained interviewers is almost always more expensive than using an online methodology and the use of more than one methodology increases administrative costs due to the need to set up two versions of the questionnaire and so forth.

In many cases where a hybrid approach would be considered ideal, a purely online approach may be used due to budget and resource constraints. This would still be an entirely valid approach as long as the results are analysed in this context and appropriate caveats applied.

iii. Face-to-face in-home interviewing

Interviews are conducted face-to-face with a trained interviewer in people's homes. Respondents are often recruited to participate in the survey by a trained interviewer approaching random people in the street. A short screener questionnaire is used to establish if the respondent is eligible to participate in the main survey. An appointment is then made to conduct the interview proper in the respondent's home.

Alternatively, interviewers will select a series of roads and door-knock until they find a willing participant who will then be subject to the screening questionnaire to see if they are eligible to participate. Specific instructions can be given to interviewers on which streets to visit, limits on the number of people who can be recruited from any given area, the exact approach to door-knocking etc. As an example, some surveys stipulate that interviewers must knock on every 4th house, ask for the dates of birth of everyone in the household and ask to interview the person with the birthday closest to a given month (rotating the given month across interviewers or across interviews to ensure an even spread of respondents).

When using the door knocking approach it is also important to stipulate the time of day at which interviewers can attempt to recruit respondents – or at least to set a quota on this to avoid situations such as only recruiting those who work from home or don't work by door-knocking in the middle of the day. Any reputable research fieldwork agency should be able to provide guidance on this.

When conducting interviews in respondents' homes, respondents are likely to feel more relaxed and this may help them open up in the interview in most cases. However, the opposite effect is possible when discussing illegal activities such as counterfeit and fake products as respondents clearly know that their address and contact details have been recorded.

Face-to-face in home interviewing is relatively expensive, fieldwork is slower than other methodologies and can have the potential for a degree of interviewer bias so usually uses a large number of interviewers. However, when internet penetration is low it is generally the preferred methodology when it is essential to show respondents some stimulus materials – e.g. if the interview requires respondents to view a video clip or look at some pictures.

A good geographical spread of respondents can be achieved through using widespread sample points. However, it may be more difficult to manage respondent quota controls than with more centralised methodologies such as online or telephone interviewing.

iv. Telephone Interviewing

Respondents are often recruited through Random Digit Dialling – a fieldwork agency will literally ring random phone numbers and ask those people who answer the phone if they are willing to participate in an interview, subject to meeting quota controls. Alternatively, it may be possible to buy a list of telephone numbers of potential respondents who meet specific criteria and these are contacted at random to find willing participants. Applicable legislation may constrain the methods used to contact potential respondents (see page 20)

The process of the interview is similar to that used with Face-to-Face interviewing with the obvious difference that it is not possible to show any stimulus to respondents.

This random approach to recruitment usually results in a slightly wider geographic spread of respondents than face-to-face interviewing.

Because of the centralised nature of telephone interviewing – usually from one single call centre location, quota control is simpler and costs are lower than using geographically dispersed face-to-face interviewing and fieldwork times are shorter.

If Internet interviewing is not possible then telephone interviewing is likely to be the preferred methodology except in the case where it is necessary to show specific stimulus to respondents.

v. In-street interviewing

Respondents are recruited to take part in a short interview in the street. Respondents are often in a hurry so interview length must be really short. Note that it would not be recommended to use the full version of the Digital Goods questionnaire as it stands for an in-street interview. A good target to aim for is a 10-minute interview.

While it is possible to select a reasonable spread of sampling points, geographic distribution will necessarily be compromised as interviews will only be conducted in certain locations at particular times of day. These are more likely to be biased towards urban locations to ensure the throughput of passers-by to participate in interviews.

This approach is best used when it is anticipated that interviews through other means will not elicit honest responses due to respondents' fear of potential repercussions due to admitting to illegal behaviours. To put respondents further at ease, the interviews can be conducted anonymously; their personal contact details are not recorded. This anonymous approach should yield more open responses however the major downside is the potential for poor fieldwork quality control as without respondent contact details interviews cannot be verified by a third party as would be the normal approach with other interviewer administered approaches.

vi. Computer Aided Interviewing

It is common these days for computers to be used in all interviewing methodologies. Interviews conducted by a trained interviewer may be administered purely using pen and paper or with the aid of computer; although the interviewer is asking the questions in person, he/she records the respondent's responses using a computer – or more often these days some kind of tablet device. This latter approach is preferable if possible. One of the main advantages of using a computer administered approach is that the computer can be programmed to automatically route questions correctly and only to show relevant questions. This is particularly important where the details of what is asked in one question are dependent on responses given to a prior question. For example, respondents are only asked if they have bought items from a store in the past 12 months if they previously answered that they had ever bought items from that store.

If computer aided interviewing is not possible then a printed paper questionnaire should be used. Showcards should be printed to accompany the printed questionnaire – one card for each question with a closed list of all the possible responses. When the interviewer reads out a question, the showcard is shown to the respondent and they are asked to select their answer(s) to the question from the possible responses shown on the card.

Some of this question routing can be complex within the questionnaire templates as they stand and if a pen-and-paper methodology is used it is essential to ensure that full interviewer training is included in the survey plan and comprehensive interviewer instructions included on the printed questionnaire.

vii. Respondent Incentives

It is common these days to provide a small incentive to respondents to thank them for participation in a consumer research survey. Not every survey requires an incentive and a fieldwork agency will be able to provide guidance as to whether it is necessary or not. As a general rule, the longer the interview length, the more likely and the larger an incentive will be required. Incentives take many different forms from entry into a prize draw, a points reward where once a given number of points are accumulated across several surveys they can be exchanged for store vouchers or donations to charity.

If any kind of financial reward is offered, it is important to ensure that it is not too large – large financial rewards encourage participation from ‘professional respondents’; people who aim to make a living from participation in surveys and prize draws. By using a smaller reward, a broad sample of respondents can be obtained whose motivations for participation in the survey are purely altruistic.

3. SAMPLE DESIGN

Before commencing any interviews, it is necessary to decide exactly who is to be interviewed; the principle choice being between a representative or target sample.

A representative sample aims to match the profile of an overall population, e.g. representative of the national adult population. The survey then looks at behaviour within the representative sample aiming to scale up responses to project incidence rates within the survey sample on to the population as a whole.

In certain circumstances it may be preferable to select a target sample – e.g. just to interview those within a specific demographic as most likely to demonstrate the researched behaviour. An example might be to just interview younger men who play computer games – in the case of researching incidence rates for use of infringing copies of games. Clearly this target sample approach is more efficient as it avoids costly interviews with people who do not play computer games. However, it will miss the opinions of the lightest gamers or those on the periphery of the definition used for ‘gamer’. Hence, the exact definition of the sample will depend on the objectives of the study.

For most surveys envisioned using this toolkit it is anticipated that the sample will be defined as a nationally representative sample of adults. However, the exact definition of 'adult' will vary from one territory or category to another. For the purchase of counterfeit grocery goods or fashion items it may make sense to select adults age 16+. For illegal downloading of music or movies it may be appropriate to reduce the lower age limit to 14. In some territories it may be perfectly normal to interview adults aged 70+ while in another, it may be more usual practice to have 60 as an upper age limit. Wherever possible a consistent approach is encouraged and samples should be as broad and representative of the national adult population as possible.

The books and articles survey contains sections on academic articles and text books. It may be desirable to select a sample of students or a more restrictive age band than the entire population if using this questionnaire.

4. PERSONAL vs. HOUSEHOLD LEVEL DATA

Interviews can be conducted on an individual, or personal basis: "Did you personally buy a DVD?" or on a household basis: "Did anyone in your household buy a DVD?". Both are valid approaches but it is important to decide on which basis interviews will be conducted and to maintain a consistent approach throughout the interview.

For simplicity and to ensure a consistent approach, it is strongly advised that all interviews conducted using these templates are done on an individual basis. Thus, survey results are projected onto the population as a whole by aggregating up based on the total adult population rather than the number of households. Questions have been worded on this basis making it clear that respondents should answer based on their own personal behaviour rather than that of the household. Although the latter is a valid approach it can be problematic with parents trying to guess what their children do etc., and leads to potential inaccuracy within the data.

5. MEDIA CAMPAIGN EFFECTIVENESS METHODOLOGY

The questionnaire templates include a module for the measurement of the effectiveness of any anti-counterfeit or pro-Intellectual Property media campaigns that may have been carried out in territory. Rather than setting out specific questions this section includes some sample questions and requires considerably more customisation than the rest of the templates. The exact questions to be used are very much dependent on the specific details of the media campaign.

The ideal approach is to use a set of questions to split the sample into two sections – those who are likely to have been exposed to the media campaign and those who are unlikely. Attitudes to infringing goods and services are then compared between these two groups. All other things being equal, the hypothesis to test is that if the media campaign was effective, then those who have been exposed to the media campaign will be less comfortable with the idea of infringing goods and services than those who have not been exposed to the campaign. Thus by comparing these two groups it is possible to look for evidence of differing attitudes.

This is presented as a relatively straightforward task, however, in reality it can be considerably more complex. There could be other differences between the two groups of respondents driving differences in attitude that need to be controlled for. If, for example, the group most likely to have been exposed to the campaign is significantly younger than the group unlikely to have been exposed to it then it could be this age difference that is driving any observed difference in opinion. To fully control for these factors, the two sample groups should be statistically weighted to a similar demographic profile. Any remaining differences in attitude once the weighting has been applied can then be attributed to the media campaign.

In order to identify these two groups of consumers, a bank of questions needs to be constructed based on their media consumption patterns to establish whether they are likely to have seen the campaign; do they read the publications where a series of adverts were placed? Do they watch the TV channels or visit the websites where video spots have been placed etc. Because the questions will be very specific and particular to each campaign, example questions for this section have not been included. If a very disparate campaign was used then it may not be possible to clearly identify those who are likely to have seen as against those who are not.

If this ideal approach is not possible or practical then some suggested questions have been included to pick up recognition of TV/Video creative or static creative executions whether they be deployed outdoor, in print or online.

ADMINISTERING THE SURVEY

It is recommended that this survey is carried out by a reputable fieldwork agency although it would be possible to run it independently.

Any reputable fieldwork agency will be able to work with the template questionnaires as they stand and customise them as required for any given territory. They should be able to set up and implement the survey. If required, many will also analyse and report on the resultant data. In the event that no suitable agency can be found locally, it is recommended that one of the large international agencies is used as they have the ability to operate in almost every country in the world. If multiple territories wish to run similar surveys at the same time it may be beneficial to set up a syndicated arrangement with one of these large agencies so the surveys can be run as one project using a consistent questionnaire and comparable reporting. Alternatively, it would be beneficial to appoint a consultant project manager to oversee the fieldwork and ensure consistency of approach, questionnaire structure and format and reporting across territories.

Anyone wishing to administer the survey themselves can make use of tools such as SurveyMonkey (<https://www.surveymonkey.com/>) or Qualtrics (<https://www.qualtrics.com/>) to administer the survey online. However, if following this route, it is essential to distribute email invitations to participate in the survey as widely as possible to ensure as representative a recruited sample as possible.

REPORTING

There are many ways in which data collected from these surveys can be reported. This section aims to highlight a few suggestions.

Key metrics include incidence levels, both at an overall level and amongst key sub-groups such as by age band. For digital goods it makes sense to consider the different types of infringing copy, for physical goods it will be useful to consider the different retail outlet types.

As a general rule, it makes sense to report the key metrics of incidence and attitudes. These metrics are reported at an overall level, projected up to the population as a whole. Metrics are then reported amongst key sub-groups. Sub-groups may be simple demographic cuts of the data such as respondent age or working status or they can be more complex. If the Media Campaign Assessment section has been included, data should be divided into those respondents who are likely to have seen the media campaign and those who are not in order to compare metrics across these two key sub-groups.

When considering sub-group analysis, it's vital to ensure that sub-groups have sufficient members to provide statistically robust analysis. As a general rule, a minimum sub-group size of $n=100$ people should be used. With a sample of this size a difference of 3-4 percentage points between two data points will be significant with a certainty of 95%.

When thinking about overall sample size, any potential sub-group analysis should be considered to ensure that the overall sample is large enough to generate all the desired sub-groups with a minimum sample size of $n=100$ respondents each. As an example, if it is anticipated that approximately 4% of respondents will fall into a given sub-group then an overall sample size of $n=2,500$ would be the minimum recommended. If this is not possible or practical, then the survey should be approached in the knowledge that this sub-group should not be studied as the reported data will not be statistically robust. If a total survey size of $n=1,000$ people is used, then sub-group analysis should be limited to those with a minimum incidence of 10% of the population.

Ideally statistical testing should be applied to the data tabulations to enable thorough testing of data points. Most statistical testing takes the form of providing a percentage certainty that the differences between two data points are real differences. For example, if 38% of respondents agree with statement 1 and 43% of respondents agree with statement 2, the statistical test will report a percentage certainty that these numbers represent a genuine difference in opinion; that more people really agree with statement 2 than statement 1 rather than it being likely down to variation within the data due to a normal distribution and too small a sample size.

Some suggested charts are included in this document to illustrate some of the deliverable outputs but this should not be considered an exhaustive list.

1. KEY METRICS - INCIDENCE

One of the key metrics to be reported is incidence levels. As long as the recruited sample is representative of the national population, incidence rates can be projected from the survey onto the national population subject to a statistical margin of error.

Incidence of buying infringing products or services can be reported – either any infringing products or services or separate incidence rates by individual product / service types, or in the case of digital content by different types of piracy.

2. INCIDENCE BY AGE GROUP

Within incidence rates there may be particular hypotheses to prove or disprove. As an example, it is widely believed that downloading illegal copies of movies is a habit predominantly of younger generations. However, it is likely that buying legal copies of movies is also more prevalent amongst younger respondents, especially if cinema-going is included. To add context to reporting it would be useful in this case to report incidence not just by age group but by reference to incidence of total movie consumption by age group.

3. INCIDENCE BY RETAIL OUTLET AND QUALITY PERCEPTIONS

The following charts illustrate how the data can be brought to life by looking in detail at the different retail outlets used and drawing comparison across retail categories.

Similarly, quality perceptions can be explored by item type – to take this analysis to another level, a comparison could be drawn between quality perceptions of those buying counterfeit items and those not buying.

4. RESPONDENT ATTITUDES

The questionnaire templates include sections on motivations for buying and attitudes towards infringing products and services. Responses to these questions can be used not just to identify prevailing attitudes in a territory, but also to compare them between key sub-groups. These sub-groups might be defined by demographics or region but may also be defined by behaviour. For example, it is recommended to look at the difference in attitude between those who are frequent consumers of infringing products or services as against those who are not, so as to understand what could be the key drivers of respondent behaviour.

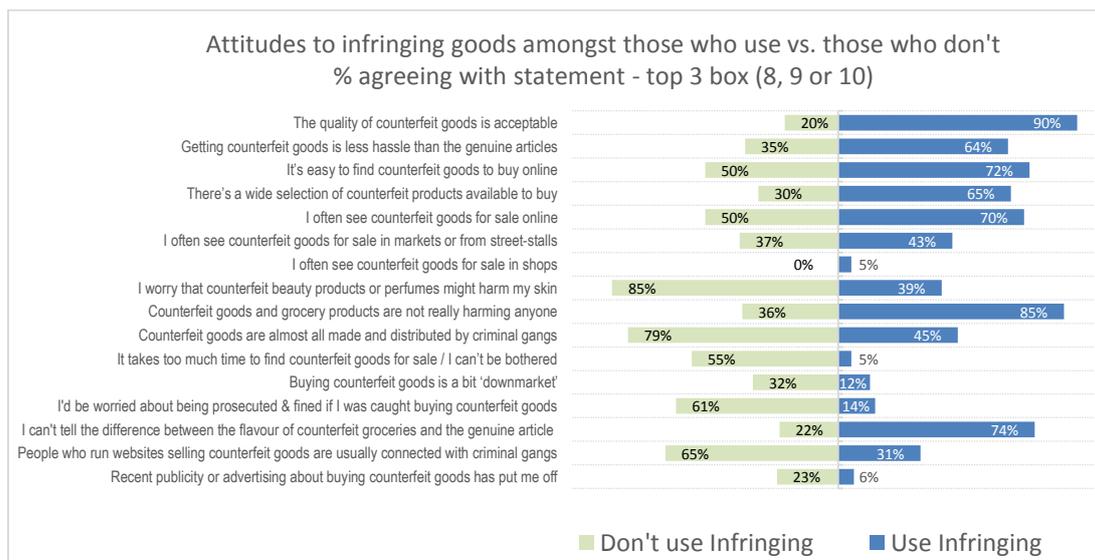

Figure 7 - Example Chart showing difference in attitudes between those using infringing goods and those not

5. CAMPAIGN EFFECTIVENESS

Campaign effectiveness is best measured by identifying two sub-groups of consumers. Those who have potentially been exposed to the campaign, i.e. have had the 'Opportunity to see' or 'OTS' for short and those who have not. Attitudes to infringing goods and services are compared between these two groups to see if exposure to the campaign drives any difference in opinion. In an ideal world each of the two groups is weighted using a data weighting technique prior to comparison. This is because there could be inherent differences in opinion driven by demographics. Unless exposure to the campaign is equally likely for all demographic groups then comparing those with the OTS as against those without may simply be reporting demographic differences rather than campaign differences. Applying weighting removes any potential demographic bias and focuses the analysis on establishing if there are any differences driven by the campaign or not.

A simple example of the application of weighting is illustrated below:

I'm against the idea / I think it's wrong to make unofficial copies of music	Total Sample	Aged <25	Aged 25+	Total Sample		Aged under 25		Aged 25+		Weighted Scores
				OTS	No OTS	OTS	No OTS	OTS	No OTS	OTS	No OTS
				Sample Base	1000	200	800	369	631	160	40
% Of Sample	100%	20%	80%	37%	63%	16%	4%	20.9%	59.1%
Top 3 Box (agree 8, 9 or 10 out of 10)	35.8%	15.0%	41.0%	31.9%	38.2%	16%	11%	44.0%	40.0%	38.4%	34.2%

This example looks at the statement “I’m against the idea / I think it’s wrong to make unofficial copies of music” from the attitudes section of the digital template. Here, we can see that amongst a sample of 1,000 people 35.8% (358 people) strongly agreed with the statement giving it a score of 8, 9 or 10 out of 10.

Within the total sample of 1,000 people, 200 were aged under 25 and amongst this sub-group only 15.0% strongly agreed with the statement. Similarly, 800 people were aged 25 or above and amongst this sub-group 41.0% strongly agreed with the statement. From this we can see that older respondents are far more likely to agree with the statement.

The next columns look at the number of people who had the Opportunity to See (OTS) the media campaign – overall 369 people had the opportunity to see and amongst this sub-group 31.9% strongly agreed with the statement. Conversely, amongst the 631 non-OTS 38.2% strongly agreed with the statement. On the face of it, it would appear that the OTS sub-group, having been exposed to the campaign are in fact less likely to agree with the statement, suggesting that the campaign is not working at all.

However, the main reason for this is because the under 25s are over-represented in the OTS group making up $160/(160+209)= 43\%$ of the OTS group compared to just 20% of the sample overall. With their overall lower level of agreement with the statement they are pulling down the score for the OTS group. If we apply a weighting to correct the proportion of under 25s within the OTS group to 20% and apply a similar calculation for the No-OTS group, we see the weighted scores look more positive with those exposed to the campaign a little more likely (38.4% vs. 34.2%) to agree with the statement.

Example calculation:

To re-weight the OTS group, take the score amongst the under 25s with OTS and multiply by 20%, the proportion of under 25s within the overall sample; then add to the score amongst the over 25s with OTS and multiply by 80%, the proportion of over 25s within the overall sample.

$$\text{Weighted OTS: } \begin{array}{c} \text{Aged <25} \\ \text{---} \\ (16.0\% \times 20.0\%) \end{array} + \begin{array}{c} \text{Aged 25+} \\ \text{---} \\ (44.0\% \times 80.0\%) \end{array} = 38.4\%$$

$$\text{Weighted Non-OTS: } (11.0\% \times 20.0\%) + (40.0\% \times 80.0\%) = 34.2\%$$

6. INTER-TERRITORIAL COMPARISON

The questionnaire templates have been set up in such a way that they can easily be used by multiple territories. Providing a similar and consistent approach has been used then it is perfectly valid to draw comparisons between data for different geographical regions or countries.

DATA PRIVACY AND CONSUMER PROTECTION LAWS

If collecting personal data, such as respondents' names and addresses, it is essential fully to understand any territory specific legislation concerning the management and storage of such data. Many countries have strict regulations on the storage of personal data. Equally, the use of automated calling systems or other ways of contacting consumers may be prohibited.

If working with a reputable fieldwork agency they should be fully aware of the regulations and have the necessary processes in place. Furthermore, they should be able to retain any respondent personal information used for data validation in a separate file so any data shared with the organisation commissioning the survey will be stripped of such personal data and thus can be easily managed and stored without risk of contravening any data confidentiality legislation.

SURVEY QUESTIONNAIRE TEMPLATES - ACCOMPANYING NOTES

Introduction

These notes are intended to accompany the WIPO Consumer Survey Toolkit Questionnaire Templates and provide guidance on how to best use the survey templates and how to adapt them to meet the chosen survey methodology and any bespoke requirements.

There are four core Templates, one each for Digital Goods, Luxury Goods and Clothing, Consumer Products and Books and Articles. In addition, there are separate modules for Computer Software and a Media Campaign Assessment which can be added to any of the core questionnaires.

This document should be read in conjunction with the introduction to ensure that the most appropriate methodology is chosen along with appropriate sample etc.

The Digital Goods Questionnaire Template covers the categories of music, video games, movies, TV series and Books covering both hard goods such as counterfeit versions of DVDs, Blu-rays, Video Games, Books etc. and digital goods such as illegal downloads from the Internet or websites providing unauthorised streamed content.

The Books and Articles Questionnaire Template covers consumer books such as novels and non-fiction books as well as audiobooks, academic articles and text books. While books are included in the Digital Goods questionnaire, the Books and Articles template digs down to gather a much greater level of detailed information.

The Consumer Products Questionnaire Template covers a wide range of goods that might be bought on the high street including grocery goods such as biscuits, cakes, wine or beer and other high street goods such as cosmetics, medicines, cigarettes, soft drinks, auto parts, ink cartridges and small electrical items etc.

The Luxury Goods and Clothing Questionnaire Template covers designer labels and branded goods including clothing and other categories of luxury goods such as perfume, shoes or handbags. Within the questionnaire there are questions which also mention high street fashion and supermarket own label fashion – these are included to draw a clear distinction between them and designer labels rather than because they are a topic of interest in their own right.

The Computer Software Module can be added to any of the above core templates to provide additional questions on use of infringing Computer Software – each of the core templates contains a reference marker to show where the Computer Software Module should be added if required.

The Media Campaign Assessment Module can also be added to any of the core questionnaires to provide additional questioning if it is desired to test recent in market media campaigns. Each of the core templates contains a reference marker to show where the Media Campaign Assessment module should be inserted if required.

Notation within the Questionnaire Documents

The questionnaires have been set out as if they are to be administered using an online methodology.

Certain text in the questionnaire documents is to be displayed to the respondent, some as introductory text, some as the actual questions. If using an interviewer administered methodology, e.g. face-to-face or telephone interviewing, the interviewer will read out these Introductory text sections. Within the questionnaire documents, such introductory text is highlighted in italics and preceded with the instruction “DISPLAY / READ OUT:”

Some questions are preceded with a routing instruction such as ‘ASK ALL’ or ‘ASK FOR ALL AWARE OF AND USED IN PAST 12 MONTHS’. If a pen and paper questionnaire is used, these must be printed on the questionnaire documents as instructions for the interviewer to follow. If the interview is administered by a computer, then these are instructions for the programmer to follow when setting up the interview script giving clear direction as to which questions should be shown to which respondents and which elements of a preceding question should be pulled forward into subsequent questions.

Most closed questions will be followed by either the instruction ‘MULTI-RESPONSE’ or ‘SINGLE RESPONSE’. In the case of ‘MULTI-RESPONSE’, the respondent should be encouraged to provide as many answers as they feel are relevant while in the case of ‘SINGLE RESPONSE’ they must provide only one answer, the response which is most applicable to the question.

If using a pen and paper methodology with face-to-face interviewer administered interviewing then for all questions where there is a list of possible responses, these responses should be printed on a piece of card which is shown to respondents – respondents can then provide answers from the list. If using a telephone interview methodology, then the interviewer must read out all possible answers and the respondent answers as the interviewer reads them out. If using a self-completion or online methodology, then all possible responses should be displayed to the respondent at once and they can select the answers that apply.

Question Numbering

The questionnaire templates have been set up with the expectation that users will customise them to suit their particular territory needs, adding or deleting categories of goods or retailers as required. The questionnaires have been set up using a sequential counter for question numbers. If adding additional questions, it’s important that this same sequential counter is used – the simplest way to do this is to copy and paste one of the other question numbers. It’s important to ensure that you select an initial question number, e.g. Q9a rather than a subsequent number such as Q9b. Subsequent numbering is achieved by bookmarking (in Word, Insert Bookmark) the initial number (e.g. the number 9 within Q9a) and then inserting references to the bookmark (in Word, Insert Cross-reference, bookmark). To update all numbers, within Word press CTRL + A to select the entire text and F9 to update.

Survey Customisation

It is expected that the questionnaire templates will be customised to suit the needs of individual territories. Additional classification questions may be added, or additional statements added to the attitude question, additional retailer types or additional categories. Similarly, categories considered irrelevant in a given territory may be removed. Indeed, whole sections can be removed if desired such as removing the Video Game section from the Digital Goods template if it is not required.

Care should be taken to maintain the overall order of questioning and to preserve the integrity of the question numbering and routing but as long as the overall guidelines are followed and similar samples of respondents are recruited, data should remain comparable between one survey and another.

Questionnaire Documents in Detail

1. Introduction Section

All survey questionnaires start with some introduction text whether the survey is conducted on the phone, face-to-face or online. The exact wording should be adapted to reflect the survey methodology but all follow a similar format. It's important to thank respondents for their participation, set expectations of what's involved from them, especially the likely interview length and to reassure them that their answers will be treated in confidence. This usually takes the form of a reassurance that this is a genuine piece of market research rather than a sales exercise and that the interview will be conducted within the rules of the local industry body e.g. in the UK people work under the rules of the Market Research Society. The example text in the questionnaire suggests inserting an agency name – this is based on an assumption that a Market Research Agency will be used to actually administer the survey. If this is not the case, this phrase should be replaced with one that names the actual body conducting the research.

In the case of this particular survey toolkit, reassurance of confidentiality is particularly important as the interview subject involves behaviour which will be illegal in some countries.

2. Respondent Demographic Screening

It is normal to start any survey with some fairly basic demographic questions. These have two purposes. All demographic questions are used for respondent classification and sub-group analysis. Some are also used to ensure that the recruited sample is representative of the target population. For example, if the survey sample is meant to represent the national adult population then quota targets will be set on specific demographics such as age and gender to ensure that they match the proportions found in the national population as determined by census data.

It is normal to ask only those demographic questions required to establish the quota sample at the beginning of a survey – any further classification questions are usually asked at the end of the interview. If the respondent is fatigued by the interview process they are more likely to remain engaged and complete the interview if their final questions are demographic questions i.e. factual, rather than considered responses.

Suggested example questions are included in the questionnaire documents based on respondent age, gender, working status and regionality but the exact questions to be used in each survey will depend on the availability of census data and territory requirements.

3. Respondent Age Questions

Several examples of age classification questions are provided. The best data to collect is the exact age and data should always be collected at this level wherever possible. Data can always be aggregated into age bands for comparison with a quota sample but if only collected by age band it cannot be disaggregated.

If data is to be compared between countries and slightly different upper or lower age limits have been used, or different age bands have been used to compare with national census data then having the actual respondent age to hand always allows data to be re-coded into comparable age bands for intra-country comparison.

If it is not possible to collect exact respondent age or if the respondent refuses, it is always useful to follow up with a question using age bands as they may be more willing to provide an answer but age bands should be used as a follow up question rather than the primary question on age.

4. Quota Check

Having established the responses to a minimum number of demographic classification questions, it is now the time to establish if the interview should continue or not. If the survey is administered using a computer, whether face-to-face, online or on the telephone, the survey programme will at this point check if the respondent is eligible to participate in the survey. E.g. if the census data indicates that the male / female split in the population is 49%/51% and 510 interviews have already been conducted with women against a total sample target of 1,000 interviews, any further interviews with women will be rejected at this point so that the survey sample matches the census data on the selected criteria.

If the interview is administered by an interviewer, e.g. using a pen-and-paper methodology then the survey questionnaire must include specific instructions at this point for the interviewer to check against their allocated quota whether they should continue with the interview or not. With pen-and-paper methodology it would be normal to ask each interviewer to carry out a set number of interviews, e.g. 10 in total, of which a maximum of 5 should be with men and 5 with women. Quotas are allocated across all interviewers administering the survey so that the total quota requirements should be reached once all interviewers' quotas are aggregated.

5. Separate Screener and Main Questionnaires

If the interview is to be interviewer administered by recruiting respondents in one location, e.g. a shopping mall and making an appointment to interview them in a second location, e.g. at the respondent's home at a later date, then it is normal to split the questionnaire into two separate documents. The first section, the recruitment screener will include all the questions up to the point where the quota check is performed – if the respondent meets the quota requirements then the interviewer should make an appointment to conduct the main part of the interview. The remainder of the questionnaire is then printed out as a separate document to be used at the interview in the respondent's home and once completed must be reunited with the matching recruitment screener questionnaire.

6. Introduction to main part of the survey

Having established that the respondent is eligible to participate in the survey, it is important to now introduce the task in hand. In this case, the introduction to be read out or displayed specifies that the survey will be about digital entertainment products, shopping for clothing and other fashion items the respondent might buy for themselves or their family on the high street or online, or products the respondent might buy for themselves or their family from a supermarket or high street store depending on the template.

Note that the exact text will likely require modification depending on exactly which categories of goods are included in later questions and typical shopping habits within the territory where the survey is to be conducted.

Ideally this questionnaire template should be used as part of a tracking study with successive surveys carried out every 6 or 12 months. Changes in behaviour and attitude can then be tracked over time. If the survey is not part of a tracking study, rather it is a stand-alone assessment, it may be desirable to include the optional question for each item type for which the respondent has bought counterfeit versions asking whether this behaviour has increased or decreased in the past 12 months.

Note that the question asking for reasons why the respondent buys counterfeit goods includes an option for "Some other reason" followed by the instruction "Please write in_____". There are several other questions that use this mechanic. The idea is that it allows respondents with some other reason to express themselves. The open text field should be included in this case in order to record the reason as otherwise it would be lost. When designing the questionnaire templates every attempt is made to include comprehensive lists within the closed questions but it is always possible that a potential significant reason has been omitted.

When analysing the data, if sufficient 'other reason' responses are collected, they can be analysed alongside the closed list. Responses collected as 'some other reason' are grouped together and any response mentioned by more than just a few respondents should be added to the data reporting as if it had been included in the original questionnaire. The exact threshold will depend on the question and sample size but as a rule of thumb, anything mentioned by 3% or more of the respondents should be added to the closed list.

7. Main Survey – Digital Goods

The next question establishes whether the respondent uses any of the specific categories – answers may be used in later questions. E.g. if the respondent never uses video games, instructions should be provided to prevent asking the respondent any further questions on use of video games etc.

The responses to these initial questions are also useful for setting context to any analysis. E.g. when looking at incidence rates for infringing behaviour it is useful to compare vs. the incidence of legal usage of the category as well as the population as a whole. For example, it is useful to compare the percentage of people illegally downloading music to the total number of people listening to music on a weekly basis as well as looking at the proportion of the population as a whole who download music illegally.

Within this first question, entertainment types are colour coded in the questionnaire document and colour coded sets should always be displayed or read out together. The colour coding is to provide clarity in how the interview should be set up, text that is shown to the survey respondent should not be colour coded.

Having established broad category usage measures, there follows separate sections for Music, Video Games, Movies, TV Series and Books. To prevent any potential order bias, the order in which these sections are presented should be rotated across the sample. E.g. if one person sees the Music section followed by Video Games, Movies and TV Series then another person should see TV Series first, perhaps followed by Movies then Video Games and Music etc.

Music / Video Games / Movies / TV Series / Books Sections

Each of these sections is similar in structure. The first question covers awareness and incidence of usage of the specific category mixing legal and infringing means of consumption (infringing means of consumption are highlighted in coloured cells for clarity in questionnaire design but should be presented to respondents in exactly the same colour, text, shading etc. as legal means of consumption). For any respondent buying or using content via infringing means there are subsequent questions. Routing instructions are included with each question. Any respondent who has not bought or acquired an infringing item in the last 12 months should be routed to the next section.

8. Main Survey - Books and Articles

The Books and Articles survey template follows a similar structure to that used in the Digital Goods template covering the categories of consumer books, audiobooks, academic articles and text books. After establishing usage of each category the interview is routed into different sections for each category. While it makes sense for all respondents to answer questions on consumer books and audiobooks, it is recommended that the text books and academic papers questions are only asked of those using the categories as they are more likely to be a niche usage category.

As with the Digital Goods questionnaire the order in which the different categories are presented should be rotated across the sample to eliminate any potential order effect. Within each category there are subsequent questions to be asked of those who have used counterfeit goods and full routing instructions to ensure those who have not used counterfeit goods are routed on to the next section.

9. Main Survey – Consumer Products

At the end of the initial demographic section is a question that establishes the respondent's involvement in grocery shopping which will provide useful analysis for questions on counterfeit versions of grocery products. When analysing shopping behaviours for consumer products, it will be useful to run the analysis amongst those with responsibility for the grocery shopping as well as the population as a whole.

The next question, the main establishment question (Q7) asks about various types of goods in a similar way to the luxury goods and digital goods questionnaire. Establishing overall usage of each of the categories provides useful context for comparison with buying counterfeit versions of each category and provides routing information to avoid asking respondents subsequent questions about categories they do not buy.

Having established overall category usage, the questions then probe on counterfeit versions asking awareness and usage followed by subsequent questions on retail outlets used, motivations, etc. Again, routing instructions are included with each question.

Within the list of consumer products are 'DVD or Blu-ray Disc', 'Music CDs' and 'Books (for reading for pleasure)'. The inclusion of these categories allows for some top-level comparison with the output from the other questionnaires.

When customising the survey questionnaire for use in a particular territory care should be taken to add additional categories if they are particularly relevant to the territory or to remove any that are not relevant. Similarly, in later questions asking about the places where the respondent has seen counterfeit items for sale additional columns can be added for other retail types such as 'Kiosk' or 'Street Vendor' as appropriate by territory.

10. Main Survey – Luxury Goods and Clothing

The first question in the main section of the questionnaire establishes whether the respondent has bought any of a series of specific categories in the last 12 months – answers may be used in later questions. E.g. if the respondent hasn't bought any perfume in the past 12 months they will not be asked further questions about perfume.

The responses to these initial questions are also useful for setting context. E.g. when looking at incidence rates for infringing behaviour it is useful to compare vs. the incidence of usage of the category as well as the population as a whole. For example, it is useful to compare the percentage of people buying counterfeit designer labels to the total number of people buying genuine designer labels as well as measuring them as a proportion of the population as a whole.

When customising the survey questionnaire for use in a particular territory care should be taken to add additional categories of luxury goods if they are particularly relevant to the territory or to remove any that are not relevant. Similarly, in later questions asking about the places where the respondent has seen counterfeit items for sale additional columns can be added for other retail types such as 'Kiosk' or 'Street Vendor' as appropriate by territory.

For any respondent buying infringing items either knowingly or un-knowingly there are subsequent questions. Routing instructions are included with each question.

11. Computer Software Module

The computer software module is intended as an add-on section to be added to any of the four core modules. It is a short section of 10 questions looking at usage of computer software, both operating systems and consumer software such as office suites, photo and video editing. This module should be inserted into the questionnaire at the place indicated in each of the four core questionnaires to ensure it does not interfere with the overall questionnaire structures and provides consistent reporting.

12. Attitudes to piracy section

This section is intended to measure respondents' attitudes to piracy in general across multiple categories. If desired, separate questions could be constructed for each of the categories; music, movies, video games and TV series / shoes, handbags, designer label clothing and perfume etc. / cakes, biscuits, cigarettes, cosmetics, etc., but this would become long, laborious and repetitive for respondents and likely would compromise the quality of data collected due to respondent fatigue.

The order of presentation of attitudes should be randomised, or at least rotated – this is relatively simple when the survey questionnaire is administered by computer, if manually administered it is usual to include instructions for the interviewer to work from the top of the list to the bottom for one interview and from the bottom to the top for the next etc.

Each of the survey templates has a list of industry specific attributes at the end of the main list – while the main list should be randomised, these industry specific attributes should always be asked at the end and kept grouped together.

At the analysis stage, responses to these attitude questions should be tabulated and cross-tabbed against those who buy / acquire counterfeit product versus those who don't. In this way, it is possible to see the attitudes that differentiate these two groups of respondents.

13. Media Campaign Assessment Section

If required, the Media Campaign Assessment section should be added after the attitude section (see separate document). It is important to site this section after the attitudes to avoid the possibility that watching the test creative materials might influence how respondents answer the attitudinal questions.

14. Additional Demographic Questions

Additional demographic and classification questions can be added to the questionnaire as the final section, after the main interview. The responses to these questions should be used for dividing the total survey sample into different sub-groups for analysis purposes and testing out hypotheses. Suggested additional demographic questions are included in a separate document but these should by no means be seen as an exhaustive list.

15. Interview Close

Finally, it is important to include instructions at the end of the questionnaire for how to close the interview.

If the survey is to be administered by a trained interviewer, then there should be instructions for them to read out a statement thanking the respondent for their time and participation.

If the interview is completed by the respondent without an interviewer, e.g. on a computer screen then the programme should display a clear message at the end of the interview signalling that the interview is over and thanking the respondent for their time.

Computer Software Module

If the computer software module is to be included in the questionnaire it should be added at this point – see separate document

Potential dissuaders section

This question can either be asked generally of anyone who is involved in any kind of infringing behaviour across all categories or it can be asked of individual categories. If it is to be asked of the individual categories, it should be inserted within each category section immediately after the question on quality of infringing goods vs. authentic goods and the wording modified slightly to make it clear the question is only referring to behaviour with regard to that category. If the question is asked of each category, it is essential to add an instruction before the question that it should be asked only of those involved in infringing behaviour within that category.

However, it is recommended to keep just the generic question below to avoid unnecessary repetition and to avoid unduly long interview times.

Computer Software Module

If the computer software module is to be included in the questionnaire it should be added at this point – see separate document

This question can either be asked generally of anyone who is involved in any kind of infringing behaviour across all categories or it can be asked of individual categories. If it is to be asked of the individual categories it should be inserted within each category section immediately after the question on quality of infringing goods vs. authentic goods and the wording modified slightly to make it clear the question is only referring to behaviour with regard to that category. If the question is asked of each category, it is essential to add an instruction before the question that it should be asked only of those involved in infringing behaviour within that category.

However, it is recommended to keep just the generic question below to avoid unnecessary repetition and to avoid unduly long interview times.

ASK ALL WHO ACCESS UNOFFICIAL COPIES OF BOOKS/ARTICLES EITHER PHYSICAL COPIES OR ONLINE VIA STREAMING OR DOWNLOADING

MEDIA CAMPAIGN ASSESSMENT TEMPLATE

Overview

This section of questionnaire is designed to be added to the main WIPO Survey Toolkit if it is desired to measure the effectiveness of an in-market anti-counterfeit / anti-piracy messaging campaign. The exact format of the questions in this section are very much dependent on the nature of any campaigns which have been running in the territory in which the survey is to be carried out.

There are two key methods of testing campaign effectiveness. In an ideal world, questions are included to establish a proportion of the survey population who have had the opportunity to see the campaign and those who have not. Attitudes and behaviour are then compared between these two groups, the hypothesis being tested is that behaviour or attitudes will be changed amongst the group exposed to the campaign.

For this methodology to be effective it is crucial that the respondents who have had the opportunity to see the campaign can be clearly identified and isolated. For example, if a campaign has played out exclusively through specific TV channels at specific times of day or within specific publications. In this case it should be relatively easy to establish whether the respondent tends to watch the relevant channels at specific times or regularly reads the specific publications and therefore whether they have had the opportunity to see the campaign. Questions are not provided for this methodology as they will necessarily be very specific to each campaign.

If it is not possible to establish those who have been exposed to the campaign versus those who have not, then a more direct line of questioning is necessary. Example questions have been provided for this methodology although these too will be dependent on the nature of the campaign and media used.

Awareness of anti-counterfeit/anti-piracy messaging – Short Version

SHOW PICTURE OF CAMPAIGN MEDIA / PLAY RADIO CLIP / READ OUT DESCRIPTION [Tailor instruction according to methodology and campaign media]

Q1 Have you seen this advert before today?

SINGLE RESPONSE

- Yes, and I understood the message it was conveying
- Yes, but I didn't understand the message it was conveying
- Yes, I recognise it but I didn't pay attention to the message
- No, not seen it before today.

The question above is not very sophisticated and is likely to result in a degree of over-claim. It should only be used if time is short and as a compromise if to use the longer version below would be cost prohibitive. In terms of analysis, attitudes and behaviours should be compared between the two groups of those who say they have previously seen the campaign and those who have not. If sample size allows, those who recognise the campaign can be split further into those who say they understood the key message of the campaign and those who do not.

Further notes:

The final question in both the video and static creative sections asks about changing other people's behaviour rather than that of the respondent. This is a deliberate means of depersonalising the task – many people rationalise that they personally are not influenced by advertising so by asking about other people we hope to get a more realistic answer.

The TV / Video creative and Static Artwork creative question structures are very similar with only slight modification to distinguish between the moving and static creatives. The idea of placing the test creative material within a real or gallery of 6 creatives is so that the respondent can easily answer the recognition question honestly. Some people will always want to give a pleasing answer when responding to consumer research and so if asked simply whether they recognise an advert they may answer incorrectly that they do because either they want to please or because they worry that they will appear ignorant if they say they don't recognise it. This is a key limitation of the 'Short Version' question at the beginning of this document.

By placing the test creative within a real or gallery the respondent is likely to recognise at least some of the creative so can honestly answer that they recognise at least one of the creatives so answers given are more accurate. This approach reduces the likelihood of over-claim for recognition of the test creative.

ADDITIONAL DEMOGRAPHIC/CLASSIFICATION QUESTIONNAIRE TEMPLATE

Introduction

Once the main sections of the questionnaire have been completed it is usual to ask some further demographic or classification questions. These are always asked at the end of the interview so that if the respondent is fatigued by the survey they are likely to carry on to completion at this point.

The answers to demographic questions must necessarily be factual and therefore easy and quick to answer. By contrast, the main section of the questionnaire contains questions that are opinions or ratings, requiring a more considered response. Such questions generally take more time and effort to complete so there is a higher potential for the respondent to drop out and not complete the interview. Demographic questions at the end of the interview feel like the home straight and so if a respondent has got this far, they're highly likely to complete the survey.

In any consumer survey there will always be some demographic or classification questions asked at the very beginning of the interview. These questions are used to determine if the respondent meets the specific recruitment criteria e.g. age band, gender and usage of a particular category. It is usual to keep the demographic questions at the beginning of the survey interview to a minimum in order to get the respondent into the main section as quickly as possible.

Demographic questions at the end of the survey should be used to help cut the data into further sub-samples at the analysis stage and to support any specific hypotheses to be tested by the survey. Example questions are provided in this document however the list should not be seen as exhaustive. Additional questions can and should be added to meet the needs of the particular organisation carrying out the research survey.

Example questions have been provided asking if the respondent lives in or works in an urban or rural area. This tests the hypothesis that counterfeit products are more likely to be found in urban areas and so those respondents frequenting urban areas are more likely to buy counterfeit goods.

Another question asks about frequency of Internet usage – low frequency Internet users are less likely to access illegal and unofficial downloads so frequency of Internet usage can be controlled for when comparing those who access counterfeit products online vs. those who don't.
